

Introduction

You are a project manager at Matrix Inc., a large organization that publishes management development materials (books, exercises, surveys) and provides related consulting and training services to clients. Matrix relies on project teams to create new as well as customized products and services. Most of the teams consist of members who are “borrowed” from different functional areas and report to both their line manager and the project

Assumptions

In making your decisions, assume that:

1. Many of the project management activities will be revised or carried out several times during the life of a project. You are to sequence the activities in terms of when each activity should first be performed.
2. The “product” of a project can be tangible (such as an exercise or a survey) or intangible
